

There's no specific trait that only so-called virgins do have.

However, there's a mucous membrane that varies from one female body to another, but that permanently stays inside each woman's genitalia.

Less than half of the women bleed during sexual intercourse.

Bleeding signifies injury.

When the membrane is injured, it heals itself without leaving any traces.

No one can actually notice whether a woman has had sex before or not, nor if she gave birth once or twice or even more.

This is why it makes no sense to expose a vagina under a knife.

Religions such as Judaism, Christianity or Islam only permit sex during marriage, and strictly forbid it otherwise.
